Public opinion had been pronounced. The United States were the first and in New York they made preparations for an expedition destined to pursue this narwhal of great speed, the Abraham Lincoln, was put in commission as soon as possible. The arsenals were opened to Commander Farragut, who hastened the arming of his frigate; but, as it always happens, the moment it was decided to pursue the monster, the monster did not appear. For two months no one heard of the ship met with it. It seemed as if this unicorn knew of the plots weaving around it. It had been talked of, even through the Atlantic back! I forgot all—fatigue, friends and collections—and without hesitation the offer of the American Government. “Besides,” thought I, “all roads lead to the monster.”

I had seen a narwhal in the North Pacific Ocean, which was taken to the antipodes. “Conseil,” I called in an intimate, true, devoted Flemish boy, who had accompanied me, and he returned the liking well. He was quite zealous from habit, evincing little disturbance, quick with his hands, and apt at any service.

One magnificent evening, the 30th July (that is to say, three days after our departure), the frigate was abreast of Cape Blanc, thirty miles leeward of the coast of Patagonia. We had crossed the tropic of Capricorn, and the Straits of Magellan opened less than seventy miles to the south. Before eight days were over the Abraham Lincoln would be ploughing the waters of the Pacific. Seated on the poop, Ned Land and I were chatting of one thing and another as we sailed on the mysterious sea, whose great depths had up to this time been inaccessible to the eye of man. I naturally led up the conversation to the unicorn, and examined the various chances of success or failure of the expedition. But, seeing that Ned Land let me speak much himself, I pressed him more closely. “Well, Ned,” said I, “is it possible that you are not convinced of the existence of the monster? Have you any particular reason for being so incredulous?” The harpooner looked at me fixedly for some moments before answering, struck his broad forehead with his hand (a habit of his), and said at last, “Perhaps I have, Mr. Aronnx. You ought to be the last to doubt under such circumstances.”
